A composer aiming to write a musical would have heard every possible variety en rule for successes. First catch an good American play in his system, have it extracted under the watchful eye of Winchell Smith, star the actor and get him working with enthusiasm for his favorite author, and then, with an actress like Roberta Arnena to piay opposite the star, the manager needn't care who's elected. He commands Broadway like a traffic cop.

The play evolved on these principles was a model of its kind, which made the spectators feel they were neighbors, watching an enjoyable family tiff and bursting with the desire to run out and gossip to others about it. In the first act—labelled "training quarters" on the programme—it starts with a typical middle class home.

Cynthia Brooke was natural and relentless as his determined wife.

Miss Josephine Victor gave a powerful sketch of the unhappy wife, who felt that her escape from auin was impossible. In her pleading with the man who was determined to expose her, since she was a pawn in the game as wen as in her hopeless despair of the final scenes, she added a finely dramatic note to the performance. And she acted the scene with her husband in a mood of passionate tenderness that was highly effective.
